

Nature is never neither good nor bad, positive nor negative. It just is. Nature does not have the mindset of a human which sees things as "right" and "wrong". Even in instances of what humans would deem beautiful, vile, wonderful, or despicable, Nature just sees those instances as things that just are, things that just exist.

An even deeper answer will come later in this program. For now, the below will suffice.

When viewed from a higher level, a higher plane of existence, i.e. the level where humans exist (a macro level of existence), the issue of "good" and "evil" comes about. This occurs because as you get further away from the foundation of Nature, of existence, of creation, of the universe complex issues begin to materialize (e.g. the classification of things as "right" and "wrong"). While seemingly helpful, this issue actually starts to cloud your vision and understanding of the entirety of Nature, of existence, of creation, of the universe.

This is a seemingly cold-hearted truth and tough concept for many to understand. What's more, many argue that ascending or advancing to a supposed higher level of existence (e.g. this level we humans exist on) should actually be better for humanity because, again, this is the level where rules come into existence of what is considered "right" and "wrong", "good" and "evil", "positive" and "negative". However, this is not beneficial if you need to understand and be in tune with Nature, with existence, with creation, with the universe since it creates confusion and cloudiness in your mindset and vision of what is the real, deep, and indiscriminating truth of Nature, of existence, of creation, of the universe.

"Negative" actions of humans, of Nature, are not negative, they just are. "Positive" actions of humans, of Nature, are not positive, they just are.
